

ACV P Loys 2275 Grant by Louis II de Savoie to Anthonius Cornu dictus de Vulliens the younger, die Jovis ante Annunciacionem Dominicam 1327

This document demonstrates one of the methods used by Louis II de Savoie to reward his functionaries in Moudon, by granting them feudal rents that he held. In this case, Anthonius de Vulliens the younger receives specific people (subjects of Louis II de Savoie) and the censes they owed on specific properties. Further, these properties, some conveyed by Louis from his own holdings, others that Anthonius had purchased or might in the future purchase from Guilliermus de Sotens (or from Isabella, the mother of this Guilliermus), or that Anthonius might receive from his father's estate by a partage or distribution among his father's heirs, were to be consolidated into a single "homagium", in other words, they were all to be considered part of a single fief, granted to Anthonius.

All of this occurred in 1327 or 1328, depending on how the calendar was reckoned on this occasion, well before Anthonius the younger became a sort of public figure as the Balli de Vaud (at Moudon) and served also at Rue. This Anthonius was eventually one of the universal heirs of Richard de Prez, who died in 1346 while on a Crusade, and as a result of a substantial loan that Richard had made to Louis II de Savoie, that had only partly been repaid, Anthonius thus acquired another source of income, in the form of the annual interest on that loan, payable by Louis II de Savoie and his heirs. Beyond that, Anthonius also married (about 1350, almost certainly as his second wife) Bonarent de Castello, Richard's widow.

Anthonius the younger did in fact continue to acquire properties and feudal rights from Guilliermus de Sotens, right up to the death of Guilliermus about 1342. A number of transactions between these men still exist and are described in the inventory of the Archives communales de Moudon.

There were undoubtedly other transactions involving Louis II de Savoie and Anthonius the younger as well as Anthonius the elder. At least one large loan, slightly over 400 livres, is mentioned in the terriers (the lender was apparently Anthonius the younger, according to later terriers). Further, a number of terriers mention that various censes which would ordinarily be due to Louis II de Savoie or his heirs are to be paid instead to the heirs of Anthonius de Vuilliens the elder, and the rights to the annual interest on the remaining unpaid principal were eventually passed down to several generations of successors or creditors of the de Vulliens family.

P Loys 2275, then is the best available example of the content of these obligations. Of special note is the amount of detail the text contains. While the properties are not described in a way that allows us to locate them precisely, the amounts of cense and the names of the tenants are specified. A similar formula is implied in the way the later terriers are phrased : specific amounts of cense are due on specific properties, but not on other properties held by the same tenants, or sometimes with an additional amount still to be paid to the sovereign instead of the de Vulliens heirs, and not in a fixed proportion over all such properties.

The currency is expressed in deniers of Lausanne, both “old” and apparently “new”. Around the beginning of the 14th Century, the “old” deniers were replaced with “new” deniers in the ratio of 12 “old” deniers to 15 “new” deniers, although other conversion rates have been noted. It is of some interest to evaluate the total value of the censes listed here. While it is possible the currency (“old” versus “new”) has not been properly specified in all cases, it appears the total value of the cash rents amounts to about 6 livres 15 sols, more than half of it from the properties that Anthonius had purchased from Sotens.

The script is clear and evidently appropriate to the period. There are two slits at the bottom of the parchment where the seal of Louis II de Savoie would have been attached, but it is now lost. There are no signatures, and the various notations on the back are all much later and not informative.

The date is somewhat in question. The inventory of the ACV interprets it as 19 mar 1327, based on the Style of the Nativity. In the year 1327 reckoned by the modern calendar, the feast of the Annunciation fell on Wednesday, March 25, and the preceding Thursday was 19 mar 1327. However, if the year was intended to be reckoned by the Style of the Annunciation, the dates in before the feast of the Annunciation in March, 1327 would fall instead in the modern year 1328, in which the feast of the Annunciation fell on Friday, March 25, 1328 by the modern calendar, and the preceding Thursday was the modern date 24 mar 1328 (the archivist Maxime Reymond appears to have favored this date). Another source listed the date as 21 mar 1327, apparently inconsistent with any style of dating, possibly a transcription error. More information is needed to verify which calendar system was in use, and the situation is possibly complicated by the fact that there is no indication within the document itself as to where it was prepared and sealed by the very well traveled and peripatetic Louis II de Savoie.
